Narrative Description

Summary Description:

The Falconer Bungalow Historic District is located on the northwest side of Chicago, approximately eight miles from the city's commercial center. The district encompasses the 4900, 5000 and 5100 blocks of West Wolfram Street, West George Street, and West Oakdale Avenue, as well as the south block faces of 4900, 5000 and 5100 West Wellington Avenue and the Laughlin Falconer Public School. The area is roughly bounded by the alley north of West Diversey Avenue on the south, West Wellington Avenue on the north, North Laramie Avenue on the west, and North Lamont Avenue on the east. The district includes 348 Chicago bungalows and antecedent forms as defined by the registration requirements outlined in the Chicago Bungalow Multiple Property Listing, along with thirty-one multi-family residential structures. Built between 1915 and 1931 (the year of construction of the last bungalow within the boundaries), the district reflects both early speculative bungalow development and individual residential development. George C. Hield & Company worked with prolific bungalow architect Ernest N. Braucher in the mid-1915s to jumpstart construction on what was open farmland subdivided by farmer Laughlin Falconer, and by the end of the 1920s the area was filled with bungalows. Despite the variety of participants, the growth and development of the district maintained a uniform scale and cohesiveness through adherence to unwritten rules regarding uniform setback and regular spacing between buildings. This trend gives a rhythm and continuity to the district's streetscapes, even along blocks where the building types vary. The bungalows in the Falconer bungalow district share common features—low-pitched roofs with overhanging eaves, banded or grouped fenestration, decorative brick and limestone detailing—that emphasize horizontality and tie the buildings to the landscape around them. Despite the regularity of the streetscapes, simple variations in entrance location, front bay and window configuration, dormer size and shape, brick color, and decorative detailing make each bungalow easily distinguishable from its neighbors.

The Falconer Bungalow Historic District contains only two buildings constructed past the period of significance (1916-1931), and of the remaining 391 primary structures (including the Falconer School at the northwest corner of North Lamont Avenue and West Wellington Avenue and Maplewood Baptist Church at the northeast corner of North Laverne Avenue and West George Street), only nine have been altered to such an extent as to render them non-contributing to the district. The most common major alteration in this district, as in most bungalow neighborhoods, is the addition of large side dormers that are set close to the façade and obscure the original roofline of the bungalow. Otherwise, the bungalows in the district retain their early twentieth century appearance, as outlined in the registration requirements of the Chicago Bungalow Multiple Property Listing.

Site and Setting:

The Falconer District is a quiet residential area which sits just west of North Cicero Avenue, a busy commercial thoroughfare. The district consists of twenty-one block faces, each divided into eighteen to twenty lots. Dimensions of lots within these blocks average approximately thirty to thirty-three feet in width and are uniformly 125 feet deep. Slight variations in lot width do occur throughout the district, particularly at corner lots, which tend to be larger than interior lots. Buildings face north and south along the four east-west streets which run through the district—West Wolfram Street, West George Street, West Oakdale Avenue, and West Wellington Avenue. All of the streets in the district are designated for one-way traffic. The right-of-way on each block face includes street lawns fronting the street pavement, as well as sidewalks between the street lawns and the property lines of the individual building lots. In general, buildings are set back approximately thirty feet from the street.

Because the Falconer District developed in the first years of the bungalow boom, with 361 of the 389 residential buildings constructed by 1925 and 100 before 1920, building footprints tend to be quite modest. Footprints range from as little as 875 square feet to 1689 square feet, but average only between 950 to 1200 square feet. The bungalows typically occupying twenty to thirty percent of the total lot space, leaving plenty of room for backyard flower and vegetable gardens and garages. Frame and brick garages approximately twenty by thirty feet occupy the rear portion of most of the district's bungalow lots. Garages that serve interior lots generally face the alley, while those associated with corner bungalows tend to face the side street for easier access. The Falconer District contains forty-six garages that date from the period of significance. For the most part, these garages are simple, utilitarian frame structures that mimic the formal composition of the more prominent bungalows only in their overhanging eaves and low-pitched hip roofs. Many of these garages are now covered in aluminum or vinyl siding and almost all feature replacement garage doors.

Materials and Stylistic Variation:

As Chicago bungalows, all of the contributing bungalows within the Falconer Bungalow Historic District are one and-one-half story rectangular brick structures with low rooflines, overhanging eaves, and brick and limestone detailing. Bungalows occupying corner lots in this district have face brick on both street-facing elevations, while bungalows on interior lots generally feature face brick only on their façades. Finished brickwork on many of these interior bungalows extends only to the edge of the main mass of the house, ranging anywhere from a few inches to several feet around the front corners of the buildings depending on the entrance configuration. Side entrance bungalows tend to have face brick that extends to just past the entrance on that elevation. The remaining elevations are of Chicago common brick laid in common bond. Secondary materials include wooden elements used to construct frame dormers, window frames, exterior doors, front porch framing on open front porch bungalows, and rear sleeping porches (many of which have since been enclosed), and limestone used for planter brackets, sills, copings, and decorative accents. Most of the bungalows in the district feature asphalt tile or sheet roofing in place of original asbestos shingles.

Like most bungalow neighborhoods, the homes in the Falconer District follow a predictable pattern of development. Early bungalows in the district were almost austere simple and extremely modest in size, costing only between $2500 and $3000 to build. Bungalows like the one at 4924 West Wolfram Street (Figure 1), designed by Ernest Braucher for developer George C. Hield in 1916, were models of economical design. An integrated porch supported by three brick piers extends the width of the façade and covers the offset entrance, which is accessed by set of wooden steps. Two double hung windows mark the living room. A front facing hipped dormer mimics the bungalow's primary roofline, providing light to the unfinished attic space. At 875 square feet, these bungalows were designed for working class homebuyers, and they occupy primarily the eastern edge of the district.<sup>1</sup> The Falconer district contains the largest grouping of early open front bungalows yet documented under the Chicago Bungalow Multiple Property Listing. Over forty bungalows in the district were built with full open front porches, a design element that was quickly phased out of Chicago bungalow construction in favor of larger interior spaces that could be utilized year round. In many instances this space issue was solved, crudely or stylishly, by subsequent homeowners. The bungalow at 4949 W. Oakdale Avenue (Figure 2), designed by architect Johan F. Knudson in 1915 for the development team of Edward H. Olsen & Henry Van Vooren, originally featured a large covered front porch similar to the porch still extant at 4939 W. Oakdale (Figure 3). At some point, most likely in the 1920s or 1930s, the homeowner enclosed the space with single casement windows with transoms. As development in the district moved westward into the 1920s, flat and projecting front bays had largely taken the place of the open front porch. Hield and Braucher collaborated again on several groups of bungalows on the 4900 and 5000 blocks of West Wolfram Street and the 5000 block of Oakdale Avenue in 1919 and 1920. These later groupings alternated larger, 1200 square foot bungalows with projecting pedimented front bays and uncovered offset entrances (such as 4948 and 5043 West Wolfram Street, Figures 4 and 5) with the smaller, 950-960 square foot open porch plans like those at 5029 and 5041 West Oakdale Avenue (Figures 6 and 7) .

Bungalows constructed in the district through the early and mid-1920s showed little variation on the basic bungalow plan. Architects and builders in the Falconer District built primarily simple brick bungalows with flat or slightly projecting front bays, groupings of standard double hung or casement windows, recessed corner or side entrances, and minimal limestone detailing—designs that seasoned bungalow architects Ernest Braucher, Lymon Allison, and George E. Pearson had been producing and selling to builders across the city's bungalow belt for years.

In contrast to bungalow neighborhoods such as the Rogers Park Manor and South Park Manor, which illustrate a complete evolution of form that progresses from simple and straightforward bungalows to large and complex designs with intricate brick and limestone detailing and lavish use of artistic detail elements like art glass windows and interior built-ins, the Falconer District is humbler and more homogenous in its housing stock. With few exceptions, the bungalows constructed in the district between 1915 and 1931 remained modest, uncomplicated housing for working class families, catering specifically to employees of the area's numerous industrial and manufacturing concerns. One of the most expensive bungalows built in the district is a yellow brick bungalow at 5119 West Oakdale Avenue (Figure 8) with a footprint of almost 1500 square feet, designed by George E. Pearson in 1925 for J. Jensen at a cost of $11,000. Although the bungalow has a more sophisticated massing than earlier bungalows in the district—the hipped roof of the projecting five-sided bay echoes the bungalow's main roofline; the gracious recessed porch covers main entrance, which is located on the side of the house and essentially hidden from view from the street, while providing space for additional windows to bring light to a front-facing bedroom—it features the same double hung windows and simple limestone and brick details as its less costly neighbors. A more representative example of the bungalows in the district can be found just across the street at 5112 West Oakdale Avenue (Figure 9), built by contractor Ben Miller in 1923-1924 and designed by architect George E. Pearson. With its flat front bay, recessed corner entry under hipped roof, simple hipped front and rear facing dormers, banded double hung windows and geometric limestone detailing, this bungalow is indicative of the homes constructed in the district at the peak of its development.

In the first years of construction, two developer/architect teams dominated the district. George C. Hield & Company, working with Ernest Braucher, and Edward H. Olsen & Henry Van Vooren, working with Johan F. Knudson, constructed ninety-eight homes, primarily on Wolfram and Oakdale, between 1915 and 1919. As the area developed, the tide turned in favor of small developers and individual builders who erected homes singly or in small groups of two to four at a time. At least forty bungalows in the district were built not on speculation but by men who were simply building a home for their families. Not surprisingly, many of these new residents were employed in the building trades, and most likely worked closely on the construction of their homes. Sam Jacobson, a Norwegian carpenter who immigrated to the United States in 1905, served as the contractor of his home at 5035 West Wellington Avenue (Figure 10), which was completed in October of 1924. By 1930, the spacious side entrance bungalow was home not only to Jacobson, his wife and teenage son, but also to their young married daughter and son-in-law, as well as Jacobson's younger brother, who also worked as a carpenter.<sup>2</sup> Although the number of participants had increased greatly by 1923 and 1924, the peak years of construction in the district, these new builders adhered to precedents in massing, materials and building placement set by George C. Hield & Company and Olsen & Van Vooren.

Statement of Significance

The Falconer Bungalow Historic District meets the National Register Criteria outlined in the Chicago Bungalows Multiple Property Listing. With 348 bungalows developed between 1915 and 1931, including major building campaigns in the 1910s and early 1920s financed by developers George C. Hield, Axel M. Anderson, and Edward H. Olsen & Henry Van Vooren and designed primarily by architects Ernest Braucher and Johan F. Knudson, the district meets National Register Criterion A local significance by being associated with events that contributed to the broad patterns of Chicago history—the promotion of single-family homeownership for city residents, countering the twentieth century trend towards increasing residential densities that characterized Chicago's contemporary apartments and tenements. For Criterion A, the years of significance are 1915 to 1931, corresponding with the dates of the construction of the first and last bungalows within the district.

Possessed of a high degree of its original architectural and urban integrity, the District also meets National Register Criterion C local significance by embodying the characteristics of a distinctive type, period, and method of residential construction—the bungalow. The district reflects both large-scale speculative building and individual residential development, and contains the largest concentration of open front porch bungalows yet documented under the Chicago bungalow Multiple Property Listing. Clusters of these early bungalows, constructed in groups of 3-12 by developers George C. Hield & Company, Olsen & Van Vooreen, occupy the eastern portion of the district. Despite the variety of participants, the growth and development of the district maintained a uniform scale and a sense of cohesiveness.

Although located in a more heavily industrial area than most Chicago bungalow neighborhoods, the Falconer Bungalow District maintained a strictly residential urban pattern that stood in sharp contrast to Chicago's nineteenth-century communities that freely mixed residential, commercial, and industrial buildings and activities. Thus, Falconer and other bungalow neighborhoods, with their distinct land-use patterns that anticipated Chicago's 1923 adoption of comprehensively zoned land uses and building restrictions, also represents a distinctive type as encompassed by National Register Criterion C. For Criterion C the years of significance are 1915 to 1931, indicating the dates of construction for the first and last bungalows in the district.

Historical Summary

The development of the Falconer District between 1915 and 1931 typified the rise and enormous popularity of Chicago bungalow neighborhoods during the early twentieth century. Between 1900 and 1930 Chicago's population doubled as 1.5 million additional residents settled in the city. During this same period the number of owner-occupied units in Chicago rose from 86,435 in 1900 to 261,750 in 1930. The tens of thousands of one and one-and-one-half story brick bungalows built in the city's outlying neighborhoods between 1910 and 1930 stood at the forefront of this expansion of single-family homeownership. Built together on entire blocks, the unprecedented form of Chicago bungalows created an entirely novel form of Chicago urbanism. While facilitating the American dream of homeownership for Chicago residents, neighborhoods like the Falconer District created a harmonious and aesthetically cohesive residential landscape from open farmland.

When Scottish farmer Laughlin Falconer immigrated to the United States in 1844 and purchased land northwest of Chicago, the area in which he settled was open farmland, prairie, and woods, with vestiges of earlier Indian settlement still evident. The closest settlement was Whiskey Point, a crossroads near the present day intersection of Grand and Armitage Avenues named for a saloon operated by George Merrill and opened in the late 1830s.<sup>1</sup> Falconer farmed a piece of land valued at approximately $4800; by 1860, he and his wife, Margaret, shared their home with two sons and two daughters. Other early settlers to the area included British born farmers David Edwards, John Hamon, Daniel Booth, and John Rutherford. Edward Simons, an immigrant from the county of West Hampshire in Great Britain, was one of the largest nearby landholders, with real estate worth $50,000.<sup>2</sup> Although the land had been incorporated into the township of Jefferson in the 1850s, new residents were few and far between until the 1870s, when the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad extended service to the area south of Falconer's farm, along the present day southern boundary of the Belmont Cragin community. Drawn by the abundance of inexpensive land and proximity to the new rail lines, Cragin Brothers & Company, a manufacturer of tin plate and sheet iron, relocated their main processing operation to Whiskey Point in 1882. Although the eleven acre plant was a boon for Whiskey Point, which grateful community leaders quickly renamed Cragin, it did not bring significant growth to the area near Falconer's farm.

Chicago attorney Samuel S. Hayes had purchased 700 acres of land, which he christened Kelvyn's Grove, just east of Falconer along a commuter line of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, but without a nearby station, the area remained undeveloped.<sup>3</sup> Settlers to the area preferred to live closer Cragin, where land was also readily available and affordable.

By the time Jefferson Township was annexed into Chicago in 1889, the area between the Chicago & Northwestern line and the two perpendicular branches of the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul Railway was home to three thriving industrial centers—Cragin, Hanson Park, and Galewood. Between 1911 and 1915, the city extended its electric streetcar line on Pulaski Road north to the north branch of the Chicago River. At the same time, streetcar lines pushed north along Cicero Avenue to Irving Park Boulevard.<sup>4</sup> The construction of these lines connected the neighborhood both to downtown and to far flung sections of Chicago as they tied into a variety of mass transit lines. By the 1910s the growth of Chicago's population combined with the network of transit lines to renew interest in the residential possibilities of the area north of Fullerton and west of Pulaski.

Laughlin Falconer (Figure 11) was among the first in the area to take advantage of the coming transition. In 1913, Falconer (who was 93 at the time) subdivided his farm into sixteen city blocks with a total of over 600 individual lots. He then sold almost all of his landholdings to real estate developer George C. Hield, keeping only the area immediately surrounding his modest farm house on the corner of Cicero and Wellington Avenue (Figure 12).<sup>5</sup> Neighborhood amenities such as parks and schools, essential to attracting residential developers and the families who would buy their homes, began to appear. In 1914, the Northwest Park District purchased land on the 4400 block of Wrightwood Avenue for Kelvyn Park. The same year, plans began for Kelvyn Park High School, which was designed by Chicago Public School architect Arthur S. Hussander and completed in 1916.<sup>6</sup> Falconer became a victim of his own success in 1915, when the City of Chicago decided that an elementary school should also be built to draw families with young children to the area. They chose the parcel of land just west of Falconer's home, which Falconer most likely had kept to provide a buffer between his farmhouse and the new subdivision, as the future site of the proposed elementary school. Although he fought the decision, the city eventually succeeded in taking the property. The Laughlin Falconer Public School (Figure 13), also designed by Hussander, was completed in 1918 at a cost of $325,000.<sup>7</sup> Falconer did not live to see the completion of the school that bore his name, but his son, William, and daughter, Margaret, continued to live in the family's farmhouse until 1942.<sup>8</sup>

More than anything else, what distinguishes bungalow communities like Falconer that sprang up between the two northwest extensions of the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul during the 1910s and 1920s is the fact that they were not segregated from the industrial and manufacturing districts where many of their residents worked—they were in the thick of it. The network of railroads between Grand Avenue and Belmont Avenue west of Pulaski Road continued to attract a variety of manufacturing concerns, producing everything from ball bearings to wood laminates, throughout the late 1800s and early 1900s. By the early 1930s, major manufacturing centers on the west side of the Chicago and Northwestern line (one between Belmont and Schubert Avenues and a second just south of Fullerton Avenue) accompanied the already established industrial centers along the CM & ST.P Railroad. The railroads were such an important part of the identities of these neighborhoods that when the community area system was adopted in Chicago in the 1930s, the boundaries of Belmont Cragin and neighboring Hermosa were defined not by streets, but by the railroad lines.<sup>9</sup> The very conditions that many potential bungalow owners were eager to escape—a patchwork quilt of urban fabric that kept residential and industrial development in close proximity—worked to the advantage of builders and buyers in Belmont Cragin. Developers in the Falconer district were building homes within walking distance of major area employers like the W. F. Hall Printing Company, which employed over 2,000 people during the 1920s, and Lyon and Healy, manufacturers of pianos, organs, and musical instruments, which opened a large manufacturing plant on Fullerton in 1914.<sup>10</sup> Such a concentrated existing industrial infrastructure did not hinder the development of bungalow neighborhoods in Belmont Cragin; instead, it helped to fuel residential construction in the area. Workers who had found employment along the railroad were eager to settle nearby and potential homebuyers could almost certainly find convenient and well paying jobs, if needed, close to their homes.

Development in the Falconer district initiated in November of 1915, when Edward H. Olsen & Henry Van Vooren began work on a series of bungalows that would fill the south block face of the 4900 block of West Oakdale Avenue. Olsen & Van Vooren hired architect Johan F. Knudson to draw up plans for five groups of two to five bungalows costing between $2500 and $3000 a piece.<sup>11</sup> Knudson designed three variations of a brick bungalow, which he alternated along the block. Because each bungalow contained only between 943 and 1035 square feet, Knudson experimented with different ways of arranging the front space. His open front porch design, seen on the bungalow at 4939 West Oakdale Avenue (Figure 3), features a full front porch that is separated from the narrow offset entryway by a low knee wall and accessed by a separate door set between the two front facing windows of the living area. This design anticipated the eventual enclosure of the front porch space—if the homeowner wished to enclose the front porch at a later date, they could easily create a sunroom that was accessible from the living room, without enclosing the front entryway or creating another opening. That was exactly what many homeowners on the block did. The front porch spaces at 4949 and 4957 West Oakdale Avenue (Figure 2 and Figure 14) were enclosed using single casement windows with transoms, probably in the 1920s or early 1930s. Because he anticipated the potential alteration and expansion of his bungalows and integrated details such as the knee wall and separate entry to guide those alterations, these bungalows do not appear, at first glance, to have been altered.

Knudson's design for 4905, 4911, 4915, 4921, 4925, 4931 and 4955 West Oakdale Avenue (see examples, Figures 15 and 16) presented a more permanent solution to the open porch dilemma—half of the façade is a flat front bay, with a single grouping of four casement windows with transoms looking into the front living room, and the other half is a occupied by an integrated front porch with corner brick pier, accessed by a single flight of concrete steps flanked by brick knee walls. The porch provides room for a chair, without exposing the entire front space of the house to the elements. A gable front roof houses one or two double hung attic windows facing the street. Knudson also designed a handful of bungalows on the block that would set the tone for the later bungalows in the neighborhood. The bungalow at 4919 West Oakdale Avenue (Figure 17) features a wide flat front bay with a band of five double hung windows between two brick piers, a small corner front entry, and hipped roof with front and rear hipped dormers—elements that would become common features in the bungalows built in the Falconer district during the 1920s. In August of 1916, Olsen & Van Vooren and Knudson collaborated on four additional bungalows on West. Oakdale Avenue. Knudson again looked for economical ways to add space to his plans. 4900 West Oakdale Avenue

(Figure 18) features a roof configuration that combines a front sloping gable that crosses the main hipped roof to provide additional space and light for the attic. Art glass windows wrap around the flat front bay, which shares the façade with Knudson's characteristic narrow front entry.

While Olsen and Van Vooren were beginning construction on West Oakdale Avenue, developer George C. Hield was also preparing to put his mark on the district. Hield, a former hay dealer from Wisconsin who had moved to Chicago in the 1890's to work in real estate, was by far the most important player in the growth of the Falconer district.<sup>12</sup> Hield purchased nearly all of the land subdivided by the Falconer family between 1913 and 1919. On April 6, 1913, the Chicago Tribune reported that Hield had purchased seventy-four acres from Falconer for $112,000.00 with the intention of building "about thirty houses of various designs, including single dwellings of the ordinary type, bungalows, and two flat buildings to cost no less than $2500."<sup>13</sup> Hield's first house in the district, 4900 West George Street (Figure 19), designed by architect Charles S. Wheeler and begun in November of 1915, seems more nineteenth century cottage than twentieth century bungalow. Knudson's forward-thinking bungalow designs going up just a few blocks away may have inspired Hield to make a change and build more bungalows instead of "single dwellings of the ordinary type."

Hield's followed this first attempt in the new subdivision with a large building campaign on the 4900 blocks of West Wolfram Street, West George Street, and West Wellington Avenue in May and September of 1916. Hield hired architect Ernest N. Braucher, who had worked as a city draftsman in the 1900s and an architect for a packing company in the early 1910s, but who would become one of the most prolific bungalow architects in the city during the 1920s, to design his Falconer bungalows.<sup>14</sup> Braucher's designs, though less inspired than Knudson's, are typical of early Chicago bungalows and reflect the architect's struggle to apply the Art and Crafts aesthetic to urban working class homes. In his first attempts in the district, Braucher executed rows of open front porch bungalows, using only variations in roofline, dormer shape, and brick color to add variety along the blocks. On the 4900 blocks of West Wellington Avenue and West Wolfram Street (see Figures 20 through 23), front gable bungalows (differentiated on the exterior from cotemporary workers cottages only by the lower pitched roofline and integrated front porch) alternate with hipped roof bungalows. of the twelve homes designed by Braucher on the block originally featured a frame porch supported by brick piers, a slightly offset front door and group of three double hung windows on the facade. Today, many of the bungalows on the block have replacement cement porches, and some have enclosed a portion of the full front porch, though not as successfully as on West Oakdale Avenue. The influence of Knudson's Oakdale bungalows can be seen only in the last group of Braucher's 1916 bungalows, on the 4900 block of West George Street. 4901 West George Street features a full open front porch, but the porch is separated from the corner entrance with a knee wall, and a separate door to the porch is situated between the two living room windows.

Hield's second and third waves of bungalow construction commenced in 1918 and 1919. For his bungalows on the 4900 block of West Oakdale Avenue, begun in the summer of 1918, Braucher abandoned the open front porch for more space conscious designs. Bungalows like the one at 4948 West Oakdale Avenue (Figure 24), featuring an offset projecting gabled bay, uncovered front stoop and hipped or front gable roof, alternate with standard flat front bungalows, such as 4930 West Oakdale Avenue (Figure 25). On the 4900 and 5000 block of West Wolfram in 1919, Braucher once again returned to the romantic if impractical full front porch, mixing them with his more practical designs from Oakdale Avenue.

During the first five years of construction, from November 1915 to April 1921, only three homes were completed in the district by builders other than Hield and Olsen & Van Vooren.<sup>15</sup> Hield constructed seventy-seven homes in the district, almost all of which were most likely designed by Braucher.<sup>16</sup> Olsen & Van Vooren completed twenty-one homes, all designed by Knudson. Five men had shaped residential development in the area around the Falconer School during those years. After 1921, however, the floodgates opened and dozens of developers, builders, architects, and potential homeowners flocked to fill the remaining lots. The years between 1921 and 1925 would mark the period of peak construction in the district, coinciding with the beginnings of the nation-wide building boom that followed the end of World War I: 240 properties were built in the Falconer district in those years, eighty-seven in 1923 alone. The largest developer to emerge from this period was Axel M. Anderson, a Danish born contractor. Anderson built twenty-seven homes in the district between 1923 and 1925, including his own home at 5059 West Wolfram Street (Figure 26), which was completed in 1924. The side entrance bungalow, a spacious 1128 square feet, features two groups of double hung windows between corner brick piers, connected with a continuous limestone sill and decorated with geometric limestone detailing. A large clipped-gable front dormer with three small double hung windows projects from the hipped roof. Limestone brackets for planter holders sit under both front window groupings. Built for $6,000, the bungalow was home to Anderson, his wife, Olga, and their two daughters.

As bungalow building continued in the Falconer district through the mid-1920s, architects and builders adhered to a simple, established economical formula for the basic Chicago bungalow—clean, rectangular forms with corner or side entrances, flat or slightly projecting front bays, multiple groupings of double hung or casement windows, gabled or hipped roofs, and geometric limestone detailing. The bungalows at 5106 and 5142 West Wolfram Street (Figures 27 and 28) are typical examples, with their flat front bays, groups of double hung windows, and small corner entryways. Built by contractor Anton Andronski and completed in 1924, the bungalows have two distinctive designs—5142 West Wolfram feature a frame clipped gable, three grouped windows on a continuous limestone sill flanked by rectangular brick and limestone detailing, while 5106 West Wolfram features a hipped roof with hipped gable, four grouped windows and minimal detailing. Ernest Braucher continued to build standard bungalows for other developers in the district, including several bungalows for Axel Anderson. 5011 West Oakdale Avenue (Figure 29), one of two buildings Braucher designed for Anderson in 1923, is a typical side entrance bungalow, with two groups of double hung windows, hipped roof and clipped gable dormer.

A small number of bungalows in the district strayed from this predictable pattern; exceptions include the bungalow at 4940 West George Street (Figure 30), designed by an unlisted architect for contractor Joe Busa. At 1440, the bungalow is unusually large, and exhibits more complex massing than most bungalows in the district. A clipped gable roof with boxed eaves covers the projecting offset square bay, which features banded windows and corner brick piers. A limestone sill connects the bay with the corner porch, which is set back under the bungalows hipped roof and covers the main entrance on the east side of the house. Hipped dormers cross the main ridgeline, and a projecting polygonal bay marks the dining room on the east side of the house. The bungalow, built for a cost of $7,000 and completed in 1923, was home to Edward E. Hall, a public school teacher who lived with his German wife, Elsie, and widowed father.<sup>17</sup> Architect George E. Pearson also built several more elaborate bungalows in the district. 4911 West Wellington Avenue (Figure 31), designed by Pearson in 1925 for Danish carpenter Richard Nielsen, features a large projecting five-sided front bay and deeply recessed front-facing side entrance. The complicated massing steps back in three stages, from the roofline of the front bay to the front gable dormer and further back to the hipped roofline of the main body of the house.

Although the similarity among bungalows in the Falconer district did little to counter the criticism over the monotony arising from identical bungalows tightly packed onto adjacent urban lots, the benefit to such standardized construction was obvious. The cost of construction for a bungalow ranged from as little as $2,500 to as much as $11,000, but bungalows averaged less than $5,000, a manageable sum for the working class families who were moving to Belmont Cragin. Builders also applied this bungalow template to the brick two- and three-flat apartment buildings constructed in the Falconer district, which often resembled two or three bungalows stacked on top of one another. The twenty-nine two- and three-story apartment buildings constructed within the district are distributed evenly among the blocks, with larger multi-unit apartment buildings occupying corner lots. Two flats appeared relatively late in the district—most dating from 1923 to 1925. Because of their similarity to the bungalows around them, they complemented the emerging character of the neighborhood.

Also special to the Falconer district is the later appearance of apartment buildings that were built even more closely to the bungalow standard. The emergence of these “jumbo bungalow” apartments in the late 1920s illustrates the degree to which developers desired to maintain the consistency of the housing stock in bungalow neighborhoods. Most of these bungalow apartments appeared on the 5100 block of West Oakdale Avenue in 1927. 5124 West Oakdale Avenue (Figure 32), built by A. Carlson for $10,000, features an offset three-sided bay, corner entrance with front facing door, and grouped double hung windows on the first floor. Above this regular bungalow configuration, set back from the front edge of the house, rises a side gabled second story with an exaggerated center dormer. From the street, the apartment gives the appearance of an oversized Chicago bungalow, when in reality it houses two separate units. 4934 West George Street (Figure 33), built in 1925, is listed as a 1.5 story brick apartment building; the second story, a clipped front gable of dark red brick with three double hung windows, sits back from the flat front, corner entry first floor façade. The cost for these bungalow apartments ranged from $10,000 to $12,000. All were owner-occupied, and those who could afford the extra upfront cost reaped the benefit in rental income; by 1930, the average rent for these upstairs apartments was $50-65 a month.<sup>18</sup>

Very few bungalows were built in the Falconer district during the late 1920s, when architects and builders in more affluent bungalow neighborhoods around the city were creating colossal bungalows with costly finishing and lavish details. 5148 and 5152 West Oakdale Avenue (Figures 34 and 35) are rare examples of these later bungalows. 5148 Oakdale, a yellow brick bungalow constructed in 1927 and designed by Braucher, features a projecting three-sided offset bay with art glass windows. Graduated steps lead through the gracious rounded porch entry to the front door. 5152 West Oakdale, a checkerboard brick bungalow completed in 1928, exhibits similar details. At $8,000, these bungalows would have been out of reach for many of the area's potential buyers.

Like most bungalow districts in Chicago, the Falconer district drew families from a diverse array of backgrounds together under the common goal of homeownership. Over forty percent of the homes in the district were owned by immigrant families; approximately seventy-eight percent of American born heads of household in the district were children of immigrants. American, German, Polish and Norwegian families predominated in the district, but over 20 different nationalities, including Swedish, Czechoslovakian, Austrian, English, Canadian, Irish, Scottish, Italian, Russian, Hungarian, Yugoslavian, Dutch and Lithuanian were also represented on the blocks.<sup>19</sup> The ready availability of manufacturing and clerical jobs in the Belmont Cragin community meant that a good number of bungalow owners in the Falconer district housed extended family or adult children who maintained jobs outside the home and likely made contributions to the household economy. This sort of living situation was especially advantageous, as the financial difficulties of the depression set in during the early 1930s. Norwegian-born bungalow owner Nels Bae at 4938 West Oakdale worked as a piano tuner at Lyon and Healy, a musical instrument factory on Fullerton Avenue. His oldest son, Henry, worked as a pattern maker at a clothing factory, while 19-year-old son, Howard, found work as a file clerk with an electric parts manufacturer.<sup>20</sup> Although a good portion of the workers in the district were employed at one of the many nearby manufacturing and industrial centers that had helped draw potential homeowners to the area, the Falconer district was home to laborers, butchers, janitors, machinist, streetcar conductors, salesmen, iron workers, accountants, bookkeepers, store managers, bakers, jeweler, dentists, stenographers, stock brokers, tailors, mail carriers, policeman and teachers, among numerous others. Like many bungalow neighborhoods, the district also housed a large number of homeowners employed in building trades. Carpenters, plumbers, electricians, bricklayers, architects, contractors, and finishers settled in the neighborhood, many into houses that they had helped complete.

The residents in the Falconer district were intimately connected to and dependent on the thriving industrial landscape of Belmont Cragin. Despite the proximity to major industrial and manufacturing concerns, the strict residential boundaries of the Falconer district were as effective as any bungalow neighborhood in creating a very different world for bungalow owners to return home to. They came to share very similar brick bungalows in a quiet residential landscape that depended upon, but was emphatically set apart from, their worlds of commerce, industry, and labor. Despite differences in ethnicity and class, the residents of the Falconer district united under their primary identity as homeowners. The bungalows that emerged in the Falconer district between 1915 and 1931 allowed working class families to also share in the American dream of homeownership. For these families, and for families living throughout Chicago's bungalow belt, the bungalow provided a thoughtfully designed, solidly built, and thoroughly modern home, while providing a place where groups of economically, ethnically, and culturally diverse people could come together into a uniform American residential fabric.

Hayes had subdivided his land in 1873, planning a comfortable upper middle class subdivision that he assumed would become very convenient to Chicago if the C & NW line built a station nearby. Unfortunately for Hayes, the nature and frequency of the traffic on his little portion of the CN & W Railway changed dramatically in 1879, when contractor and real estate operator J. B. Brown chartered the Chicago & Western Indiana Railroad Company and began construction on a belt railway that would eventually encircle Chicago and connect every major railroad entering the city. The belt line began in South Chicago and ended at the southern end of Kelyvn Grove, bringing industry and manufacturing instead of suburban developers.

Boundary Description and Justification

Geographical Description, Boundaries, Conditions, and Non-Contributing Structures

Boundary Description

The Falconer Bungalow Historic District is located in Section 28, Township 40 North, Range 13 East, UTM Grid Zone 16T, Chicago, Cook County, Illinois. The boundaries are as follows: starting at the intersection of North Laramie Avenue and West Wellington Avenue, the boundary runs east along West Wellington Avenue to the intersection of North Lavergne Avenue and West Wellington Avenue, running north along North Lavergne Avenue to the intersection between West Nelson Street and North Lamon Avenue, running south on North Lamon Avenue to the intersection of North Lamon Avenue and the alley separating West Wolfram Avenue and West Diversey Avenue, running west along this alley to the intersection of the alley and North Laramie Avenue, turning north and running north on North Laramie Avenue to the beginning point.

Boundary Justification

The boundaries of the district encompass ten full residential blocks and three single block faces of primarily Chicago bungalows developed between 1915 and 1931, which form a cohesive and uniform landscape consistent with other Chicago bungalow districts. The district is bound on the west by North Laramie Avenue. The district's eastern boundary is North Lamon Avenue. Relatively few significant alterations to the bungalows detract from their original expressions. The district's northern boundary is formed by West Wellington Avenue at the 5000 and 5100 blocks; at the intersection of North Lavergne Avenue, the boundary extends north, then west along West Nelson Avenue to include the Falconer School, connecting to the district's southern boundary, North Lamon Avenue, at the intersection of West Nelson Avenue and North Lamon Avenue. The character of the neighborhood is further preserved by the continued use of its bungalows exclusively as private residences.

The architectural continuity of this neighborhood does not extend in any direction beyond the district's boundaries. While a residential character persists directly west of the boundaries, the area does not maintain the consistency of the district area, and West Laramie Avenue, a secondary commercial street, is a clear dividing point. Commercial buildings line North Diversey Avenue, a heavily traveled two-way street, marking a clear shift in neighborhood character south of the district. The northern boundary of the district jogs to include the Falconer School, which is important for its role in drawing developers and homebuyers to the area.
